THINK!;

Importance to cryptocurrencies

What does this mean for digital currencies, which, unlike fiat currency, has no underlying interest rate? If anyone wants to lend Bitcoin or another such currency to somebody else, that's between the lender and borrower.

However, the nature of cryptocurrency is that, on the whole, its value constantly increases due to it being a finite resource – it cannot be created willy-nilly by a central bank. Another way of looking at it is this: as fiat money becomes less valuable due to inflation, digital currencies become more valuable relative to fiat ones.

This principle makes it difficult to justify “cashing out” one’s crypto holdings. When a deflationary asset (cryptocurrency) is sold to buy an inflationary one (fiat currency), it becomes far more difficult to buy back the digital currency that you initially sold. We’ve all heard stories about folks who sold Bitcoin a year or two ago to purchase mundane items, only to dearly regret it later. This implies that any cryptocurrency loan would eventually become unaffordable, with or without interest attached.

We may never forget that, because true cryptocurrencies are strictly finite, they are deflationary by definition. That forces a completely new paradigm for humanity, requiring a totally new take on what we refer to as economics, and how we will react to a system where interest is absent.
